Notling remarkable occurs in the history of Germa-ry from this time till the reign of the emperor Claudius. A war indeed it fails to have been carried to by Lucas Domitina, father to the empero Necro. But of his exploits we know nothing more than that he penetrated beyond the river Elbe, and led his arm farther into the country than any of the Romans had ever done. In the reign of Claudius, however, the German territories were invaded by Cn. Domitina Cuchabh, one of the greatest potential of his age. But when he was on the past of forcing them to found to the Roman yoke, he was recalled by Claudius, who was jelous of the reputation he had acquired.

Russians had been. After fewest defects, the emperor was as half obliged to content to pay an annual tribore to Russian king of the Docians's which con-tuned to the time of Trajan. But that warlike price refited to pay tributes, lading, when it was de-manded of him, that "he had never been opened by Decebahsli." Upon this the Dacians pailed the Danang, and began to combat holidies in the Roman territories. Trajan, glad of this opportunity so humble an enemy whom he began to fear, drew to gather a migrey, and reached with the usual expeditition to the banks of the Danube. As Decebahls was not applied of his arrival, the emperor pailed the rice without oppose, and encaring Docia, had waite the country with fire, and favor. At all he was met by Decebahsla with a numerous army. A bloody engagement ruled, what the Docians were defeated ; though the victory colt the Romans dear: the wounded were in numerous, that the wanted him to bind their wounds, and to supply the defect, the emperor genessously devoted his own ward-ride. After the military, he parted December from place the place, and at full obligation to confront to a peace on the following terms: 1. That he should remember the territories which he has rapidly taken from the neighboring nations. 2. Thus he should deliver up his arms, his writable engines, with the ar-fices who make them, and all the Roman cheerter. 3.That for the future he should entertain no deferters, nor take into his service the native of any country subject to Rome. A. That he should dominate all his forteller, calles, and frong holds. And, lathy, That he should have the fame friends and foes with the people of Rome.

This peace was of no long duration. Four years after (A.D. 10;). Decebahus, unable to live in fer-virtude as he called it, began, contrary to the late treaty to male men, provide any entertain deterres, family his calles, and invite the neighbouring nations to join him again the Romans as a common enemy. The Seythuan bankersed to his ridiculous; but the Jayges, a neighbouring nation, writing to bear arms against Korea, Decebahis invaded their country. Here upon Trajan marthed against him; but the Dician, finding himself unable to withstand him by open forces, laid reconforts to teachers, and attempts to get the emperor murdered. His design, however, proved positive, and Trajin parted his insure the Ducia. That his troops might the more readily pfs and re-pals the Danube, he built a bridge over that river; see which by the ancient is flyled the most magnificent and relatively wonderful of all his works. To guard the bridges? "130-
